and not only boys but men availed themselves of the advantages they afforded to those who sought for knowledge. Thus Bologna became distinguished for its school of law; Paris for its school of theology; Montpellier for its school of medicine. Charters were granted them by Pope or Emperor giving them the privilege of conferring authority to teach on those whom they deemed fitting persons. In England, Oxford claims King Alfred as her founder. Wherever a teacher duly authorised established a school there was the potential germ of a University, for if it proved attractive it received recognition, carrying with it the right of conferring a degree which gave the possessor high social rank, as well as a licence to teach. Such a University was not tied down to any building, nor even confined to any place. The community of students with their teachers, who formed the University, might, and occasionally did, migrate for a time to some other town. Each was to no small extent governed by its own laws, and was linked to all the other Universities by mutual respect for their common rights. In their combined character they constituted the great teaching body of the world. At first the students were divided into nations, a division apparently geographical rather than ethnological, and each nation had its proctor (procurator) at its head. In England there were two nations, the northern and the southern, whence I suppose the two proctors at each of our old Universities. As the subjects taught increased in number, and became more distinctly limited in their range, the several faculties of theology, law, medicine, and arts were founded, each watched over by its Dean, and the division into nations was gradually supplanted by the division into faculties. Thus they took their present form not in accordance with any preconceived plan, but rather as required by the exigencies of the times. If we trace up the history of our own University we shall find its development was of a similar character. The first movement directly bearing upon its origin was when a meeting was held at the close of the year 1857, at which the masters of the leading State schools of Adelaide, and also of the higher schools not connected with the State, considered how far it would be advisable to have some form of general or competitive examination as a test of their work. The movement had the warm sympathy of the then Governor, Sir R. MacDonnell, and of his Private Secretary, Mr. Paisley, a scholar of a very high order. Just about this time by an Act of Council the Mechanics' Institute was dissolved and handed over to a board of governors appointed under the Act, and incorporated under the title of the South Australian Institute. Power was given to the Board to establish classes for instruction in various subjects, and they were held, but with no great amount of success. At this time young men from South Australia wishing to study medicine had to proceed to England for that purpose, and after landing there before commencing their medical course had to pass an examination of a preliminary character, including a limited acquaintance with Latin. The Board of Governors of the Institute entered into communication with the Royal College of Surgeons in England, and ascertained that they would accept the certificate of a competent examining body here as
