My dear Professor Darmon,

I have received with pleasure your letter of November 15th. but it appears on searching my files that I have no copy of the final resume which I attempted in connection with the contributions to our conference in the field of mathematical statistics.

I am afraid I had forgotten that I had left with you a statement of my remarks, as it is clear I did from your possessing the first four pages of it. I am afraid we must conclude that this was the only copy and in its fragmentary form is now the only record apart from our memories.

May I say that I consider my remarks, though perhaps serving as a useful reminder to members of the conference at the time, are at the present moment scarcely worth putting on record. At least you may feel assured that I shall not feel badly treated if the matter is summarised merely with a statement that I briefly reviewed the ~~on~~ contributions on mathematical statistics.

Yours sincerely,
