28th October, 1955.

My dear Tage Kemp,

Thank you for sending me details of the First International Congress of Human Genetics, which I shall certainly try to attend.

I am also honoured by your invitation to give an introductory lecture at the plenary session on August 3rd. As you know, I have long considered that blood group studies have revolutionized the outlook and possibilities open to human geneticists who now, for the first time, are able to set about developing a genuine population genetics of mankind.

Sincerely yours,
